Phrasal Verb and Idioms

It's like cooking: combine flour and water, stick it in the oven for a bit, and you have bread. If you combine a verb and certain prepositions, and stick it somewhere in a sentence, you have a phrasal verb. However, baking the dough in a gas oven will obviously result in a different flavor than baking the dough over an open fire; phrasal verbs don't require such varied treatment to have a different meaning, even if you're working with the same two words. Sometimes all that's required is they phrasal verb being used in a different room of the house.

This is where the idiomatic meaning comes in. You won't be able to figure out the meaning of the phrasal verbs just by looking at the two or three words involved. Each phrasal verb is capable of having several meanings, and the meanings can also vary from place to place: if English isn't your first language, be sure you understand the local idiomatic interpretation of a phrasal verb so you don't end up getting your face slapped. For instance, you can look at a baby who is just learning to walk and say, "She really gets around"; you don't want to say that about a twenty-three year old woman.

Separable Phrasal Verbs

Separable phrasal verbs are transitive (they can take a direct object), and the direct object can separate the verb and the adverb (or preposition). If you encounter a new phrasal verb, there's no way to identify it as separable. If you're unsure, look up the meaning and usage in a good dictionary which gives examples.

I need to take back the shirt I lent you.

Where's that shirt I lent you? I need to take it back.

In the first example, the object (the shirt) comes after the phrasal verb. In the second example, the object (it) separates the verb from the adverb. The phrasal verb has the same meaning in both examples.

The cloth is so thin you can see through it.

The project is difficult, but we have to see it through.

By separating see through, we change the meaning of the phrasal verb. In the first example, it means the cloth provides no barrier to sight. In the second example, it means the project needs to be completed.

Alice is sick today: call Catherine, and see if she can fill in.

Sorry I'm late; can you fill me in on what's happened so far?

Wash this teapot out, please.*

Wash out this teapot, please.*

We heard you were feeling low, so we've come to cheer you up.

Cheer up! Life isn't all bad.*

Put on your coat and let's go!*

Put your coat on! Let's go!*

There's no such thing as a man in the moon. Stop trying to put me on.
